Honour Killing in Iran's Kurdish Regions

In the Islamic Republic of Iran, research and report on honour killings, like research and report in many other social issues related to violence against women is categorised as part of a threat to the national security. Therefore, at the national level, reliable and accurate statistics are rare. However, women activists in Kurdistan have managed to do some work on this issue and for this reason, sample examples in this report come exclusively from the Kurdish areas.

Honour killing is not an act of violence by one man against a woman. It is a set of male-dominated system which demonstrates itself in forced marriages, early marriages, female virginity, female genital mutilation, acid attack, deprivation from education, all of which systematise social relations between men and women. The killing of a woman is related to the man's honour to sustain the system of male domination.

Men's social status is diminished among their tribe, village, and hometown and within the family if such code of honour is broken by a female family member. Often those who kill a family member admit pressures by the society they live in plays an important role.

Articles 301 and 302 of the new Islamic penal code have facilitated honour killings. Iran's penal code based on Ghisas (retribution) leaves the punishment to a family member who is either the culprit himself or a close family member. In case of a wife killing, the husband pays half of Diyeh (blood money) to the wife's family to seek their pardon.

The cases of 32 women documented by Kurdish women activists demonstrate the scope, the variety of brutality and violence against women in the context of honour killing.

- 1- Samira Dadgostar, 18 from Nasar Mar village was abducted by the village Sheikh for 2 days. After she was returned, her family killed her secretly. The villagers shaved the Sheikh's head, put women's dress on him (a sign of contempt which was repeated in Marivan later) and drove him on a donkey round the village. Samira's killers were released (2007).

Shahin's murder was met by fierce reaction of women activists who accompanied her body to the cemetery and spoke of the issue of honour killings (2008).
- 6- In August 2008, Fereshteh Nejati was brutally murdered by her father and uncle who was a drug dealer. She was the 3rd child in the family. Her mother was divorced by her father and committed to a mental hospital due to maltreatment and psychological disorders.

The news spread through village and public opinion turned against her father and brothers so much that taxis refused to give them a ride. The family moved to Marivan under pressure. Then he went to the mosque and informed the people through loudspeaker that he killed her daughter. She was killed on 8th March 2013. A number of activists went to the village to attend Safron's funeral but were turned down. She was buried at a corner in the cemetery.

Honour killing is a worldwide phenomenon which requires a worldwide effort by the governments to change laws and education to transform minds and more than that to eliminate violence against women in other areas alongside honour killings.
